Artykuł został zdigitalizowany i opracowany do udostępnienia w internecie przez Muzeum Historii Polski w ramach prac podejmowanych na rzecz zapewnienia otwartego, powszechnego i trwałego dostępu do polskiego dorobku naukowego i kulturalnego. Artykuł jest umieszczony w kolekcji cyfrowej bazhum.muzhp.pl, gromadzącej zawartość polskich czasopism humanistycznych i społecznych.

Tekst jest udostępniony do wykorzystania w ramach dozwolonego użytku.
Only a few of such subscriptions without the pertaining contracts have been known so far. It is natural that the Michigan papyri afford a new opportunity to approach the problem from another viewpoint than it has been done before. In a highly instructive introduction Dr. Husselman deals with the matter. Her conclusion that those subscriptions were not the copies of the contract which had to be deposited in the archives, but were drawn up for the use of the contracting parties is persuasive. On information supplied by them the contract was drawn up by a clerk of the grapheion on a payment of a fee, grammatismos (cf. infra). The parties to the contract then subscribed the document. Only of these subscriptions were prepared additional copies for each party and left at the grapheion, together with one complete document. The parties involved could later obtain their copies, ekdoisma, i.e. the subscriptions prepared previously, and completed with the full text of the agreement, inserted into the space left for it. This was the procedure normally observed. But when the transaction was a typical one, without any particular or exceptional clauses, the subscriptions alone were written in the presence of the notary who noted in the margin the signalments of the parties and some other brief remarks to be able to fill in the body of the contract at a later time. This procedure explains the abridged contents and the external conditions of many Michigan papyri as well as some deviations from the normal scheme when only the preliminary draft and not the contract itself is preserved. With the beginning of the Roman era a new kind of documentary procedure came into existence which deprived the privately held copies of contracts, as they had been usual in the Ptolemaic period, of their importance. From the contract drawn up by a state notary, demoussos ekratemntos, an official copy was always available. The ekdoisma retained in the office seem to be the essential condition for the copies withheld by the notary until full payment of the fees was made. Pp. 3-11 of the edition bring a precious contribution to the knowledge of the bureaucratic practice observed in the record office of Tebtunis, should be studied before entering into the lecture of the single texts published.

The first papyri of the publication, nos. 226-232 are, with one exception, pettions of different contents, directed to the strategos. The complainants ask that the wrongdoers be arrested and sent to him επί τῆς ενέμησις τεσσαρων. Taubenschlag, Law of Graeco-Roman Egypt (1944) 374 n. 67 translates this locution with "fitting punishment," while the editor of this group of documents (Boak) speaks of "the coming assizes" in the translations of no. 226, 228-230. As results from the introduction to 228 he thinks right of the next conventus, apparently led to this conclusion by no. 231, 29, where, in fact, the plaintiffs speak of conventus (dialogismos). The respective clause in no. 231 has however quite a...
Only a few of such subscriptions without the pertaining contracts have been known so far. It is natural that the Michigan papyri afford a new opportunity to approach the problem from another viewpoint than it has been done before. In a highly instructive introduction Dr. Husselman deals with the matter. Her conclusion that those subscriptions were not the copies of the contract which had to be deposited in the archives, but were drawn up for the use of the contracting parties is persuasive. On information supplied by them the contract was drawn up by a clerk of the grapheion on a payment of a fee, grammatikon (cf. infra). The parties to the contract then subscribed the document. Only of these subscriptions were prepared additional copies for each party and left at the grapheion, together with one complete document. The parties involved could later obtain their copies, ekdosima, i.e. the subscriptions prepared previously, and completed with the full text of the agreement, inserted into the space left for it. This was the procedure normally observed. But when the transaction was a typical one, without any particular or exceptional clauses, the subscriptions alone were written in the presence of the notary who noted in the margin the signalments of the parties and some other brief remarks to be able to fill in the body of the contract at a later time. This procedure explains the abridged contents and the external conditions of many Michigan papyri as well as some deviations from the normal scheme when only the preliminary draft and not the contract itself is preserved. With the beginning of the Roman era a new kind of documentary procedure came into existence which deprived the privately held copies of contracts, as they had been usual in the Ptolemaic period, of their importance. From the contract drawn up by a state notary, demosios chrematismos, an official copy was always available. The ekdosima retained in the office seem to be the copies withheld by the notary until full payment of the fees was made. Pp. 3-11 of the edition being a precious contribution to the knowledge of the bureaucratical practice observed in the record office of Tebtunis, should be studied before entering into the lecture of the single texts published.

The first papyri of the publication, nos. 226-232 are, with one exception, petitions of different contents, directed to the strategos. The complainants ask that the wrongdoers be arrested and sent to him πρὸς τὴν ἱσομίντον ἐπίζοδον. Taubenschlag, Law of Graeco-Roman Egypt, (1944) 374 n. 67 translates this locution with “fitting punishment,” while the editor of this group of documents (Boak) speaks of “the coming assizes” in the translations of no. 226, 228-230. As results from the introduction to 228 he thinks right of the next conventus, apparently led to this conclusion by no. 231, 29, where, in fact, the plaintiffs speak of conventus (dialogismo...). The respective clause in no. 231 has however quite a different wording and ἀνέφθες should not be identified with the procedure before the court. As the phrase mentioned above the applicant asks simply that the accused be arrested and sent to the strategos for a trial. All petitions have, more or less, to do with criminal affairs and procedure. No. 226 is connected with a lease contract previously concluded: the lessee of a granary belonging to the temple of the god Kronos of Tebtunis, had carried off its doors and committed other contraventions against the contract. Of more criminal nature is the wrongdoing of the petitioner of no. 228 complaining off he and his wife have been insulted by his debtor, who refused the payment of the debt. Moreover, his wife was brutally beaten although she was pregnant. The result was that she gave birth to a dead child and her life was in danger. A similar complaint contains no. 229, while in no. 230 bodily insult concurs with larceny established in the plaintiff's opinion αὖ απεφίλημι = in flagranti, since he found the stolen goods in the thief's house. (Correct use of the location in no. 229, 12). It is noteworthy that the complainant made the search for the stolen beams (not "investigation of the matter," as in the translation p. 34) in the domicile of the thief in company of the epistates of the village. For similar provision in Roman law see Mummens, ROM. STRAFRECHT 746, and for the papyri Taubenschlag, STRAFRECHT 66. No. 231 is—in spite of its mutilated condition—an interesting text, with a rather complicated background.—No. 232, a petition to an exegetes, has been known despite its mutilated condition—an interesting text, with a rather complicated background.

With different taxes and administrative law are concerned the nos. 233-236; no. 233 is a corrected edition of an oath of slave guards, published first in 1925 and reedited in SB. III 7174.

Nos. 237-242 are registers (anagraphe) of the grapheion of Tebtunis, an excellent illustration of its manifold activity. They are competently explained by Boak, in connection with similar registers in P. Mich. II. No. 238, a long text of 247 lines, perfectly preserved, is a quadrimestrial register of 46 A.D. (chronologically it is a continuation of P. Mich. I. 123 R) with 239 contracts registered and annotations to each item whether the grammation-fee was paid or not. The editor assumes now that the fee was paid for preparation and registration of the document (p. 56). Otherwise Boak, P. Mich. II p. 89, where it is expressly marked as "not a registration fee," and Dr. Husseim, P. Mich. V, p. 6 and 10: "for the writing of the document and perhaps for the papyrus on which it was written." When the party was freed from the fee, it is noted by the word χαλέω,—when the payment was adjourned, the officer of the grapheion made the remark διάστη, μή γάρ. The terminology for designating the nature of the single documents shows some interesting items, as for instance, v. 23: ὡμολογία γιγα, where probably a word is missing: v. 27: ἀν. πρόμπτος δικαιῶν, cf. BGU. 297, 21: v. 35, 173 homologia ἀναγραφέως, cf. γράμματα ἀναγραφέως in P. Oxy. VI 989, 15 and infra: v. 235: ἀν. γονητίαν τιτίκην; v. 149, 182, 219: ἀναγραφή φαφρύς. In many entries, as 107, 157, 197, 203, etc., only the parties to and the object of the transaction indicated simply as homologia are mentioned.—While nos. 238 and 240 are of a similar structure as no. 237, no. 241 contains instead several abstracts of contracts registered at the grapheion on the date indicated at the top of the papyrus. The difference between a simple list of contracts, anagraphe, and the so-called ἐξήγερσια containing abstracts of contracts is perfectly illustrated by the papyri mentioned.

Nos. 243-248 are of particular importance. They are efficiently commented on by Prof. Boak whose introduction to 243 is a remarkable supplement to his previous article on The Organisation of Guilds in Greek-Roman Egypt, Trans. Am. Phil. Ass. LXVIII (1937), 212ff. These ordinances were, as correctly stressed by the editor, of a contractual nature, and bound the members of the guild by virtue of their own consent. The association of 244 is organized for one year only, but it could be annually renewed. This is a further evidence of their foundation on the members' agreement. The ordinances acquired their validity after having been subscribed by a majority of the members, cf. 245, 12. The guilds, as reflected in the Michigan papyri, were mostly organizations for religious or convivial purposes and presided by a provator, called also epimeletes or hegoumenos. The main sources of the guild's funds of 243 were monthly dues to be paid by the members, fines imposed upon them for different contraventions, as, for instance, misconduct under the influence of wine, failure in attending a meeting of the guild, usurping another's place at a banquet of the guild, bringing an accusation against a fellow member or slandering him, intriguing against another member or ruining his household. Additional contributions were paid by the members on special occasions in their private life, as marriage, birth of children, purchase of property or cattle, etc. The members were moreover obliged to help another member in trouble, to supply bail for him in the case of his imprisonment for debts. Particular regulations are settled in the event of death of a member or one of his family. All this shows a spirit of fraternity and solidarity among the members. Noteworthy is the conclusion of the ordinance, 243, 12: τῷ δ' ἄλλῳ δὲ ἔννοιαν ἐναρκῇ. If the editor's interpretation (p. 95) be correct, the phrase contains the provision that all other matters shall be regulated by the vote of the guild. It is, however, possible that this general formulation refers to the foregoing one and the nature of the single documents shows some interesting items, as for instance, v. 23: ἀμολογία τιμῆς, where probably a word is missing; v. 27: ὁμ. τροφίμιον δουλείαν, cf. BGU. 297, 21; vv. 35, 175 homologia ἀπερισπαστοῦ, cf. γράμμα τα ἀπερισπαστοῦ in P. Oxy. VI 898, 15 and infra; v. 235: ὁμ. γεωργίας πιστέως; vv. 149, 182, 219: τροφίτις φηρῆς. In many entries, as 107, 157, 197, 203, etc., only the parties to and the object of the transaction indicated simply as homologia are mentioned.—While nos. 238 and 240 are of a similar structure as no. 237, no. 241 contains instead several abstracts of contracts registered at the grapheion on the date indicated at the top of the papyrus. The difference between a simple list of contracts, anagraphe, and the so-called εἴρομενα containing abstracts of contracts is perfectly illustrated by the papyri mentioned.

Nos. 243-248 are of particular importance. They are efficiently commented on by Prof. Boak whose introduction to 243 is a remarkable supplement to his previous article on The Organization of Gilds in Greco-Roman Egypt, Trans. Am. Philol. Ass. LXVIII (1937), 212ff. These ordinances were, as correctly stressed by the editor, of a contractual nature, and bound the members of the gild by virtue of their own consent. The association of 244 is organized for one year only, but it could be annually renewed. This is a further evidence of their foundation on the members' agreement. The ordinances acquired their validity after having been subscribed by a majority of the members, cf. 243, 12. The gilds, as reflected in the Michigan papyri, were mostly organizations for religious or convivial purposes and presided by a prostates, called also epimeletes or hegoumenos. The main sources of the gild's funds of 243 were monthly dues to be paid by the members, fines imposed upon them for different contraventions, as, for instance, misconduct under the influence of wine, failure in attending a meeting of the gild, usurping another's place at a banquet of the gild, bringing an accusation against a fellow member or slandering him, intriguing against another member or ruining his household. Additional contributions were paid by the members on special occasions in their private life, as marriage, birth of children, purchase of property or cattle, etc. The members were moreover obliged to help another member in trouble, to supply bail for him in the case of his imprisonment for debts. Particular regulations are settled in the event of death of a member or one of his family. All this shows a spirit of fraternity and solidarity among the members. Noteworthy is the conclusion of the ordinance, 243, 12: τὰ δὲ άλλα ἡ έστὶ τῶν κοινών δόξην. If the editor's interpretation (p. 95) be correct, the phrase contains the provision that all other matters shall be regulated by the vote of the gild. It is, however, possible that this general formulation refers to the foregoing one and concerns only further decisions taken by the gild in event of the death of certain persons connected with the association.

No. 245, an ordinance of the salt merchants, has been known from an earlier publication by the same editor in Am. Journ. of Philology LVIII (1937) 210ff. This ordinance has a more commercial character; it fixed salt prices and the territory where either all members or individual ones might sell salt, and besides this penalty clauses settling fines to be paid both to the common fund of the gild and the treasury. But monthly banquets are also provided. To our knowledge of private associations as corporate bodies in Greco-Roman Egypt, a short synthesis of which was given lastly by Taubenschlag, Law cit., 471, the Michigan papyri supply a remarkable contribution.

Nearly one third of all texts published are sale contracts (251-309) with different objects, as vacant lots, cataceic and sacred land, vineyard, houses, slaves. Many of these documents present some interesting details, some deserve particular attention, as for instance 262, where a husband retains a few dowry objects according to their symbiosis, as a part of the price for cataceic land he is selling to his wife. The penalty clause shows a new particularity (vv. 308ff.): restitution of the price of the allotment increased not only by a half, but also by interests. If I am correct, this is the first example of such a combination (cf. Berger, Geschichte 120ff.; Taubenschlag, Law cit. 246; similar provision in 276, 12). Besides this a penalty is settled on ίδιον xπτος to be paid to the other party, without, however, being called επιτομος which it really was.—No. 264: sale of a slave where a former sale of a house and court is being mentioned as remaining valid. It is not quite clear why this reserve has been made. It is a characteristic feature of the Michigan papyri that very often previous agreements between the same parties are referred to and their validity confirmed although the necessity for such a confirmation within the frames of the new contract concerning a different matter, is not given. The respective clauses are introduced by the settlement that the party involved should not suffer any diminuation of rights with regard to the previous agreement (μη ϋαξραντα etc.) or that the obligation originating from the previous contract remain valid (μη ςεκαυ λεγων etc.). Thus sale contracts refer to previous sales or loans, loans to former loans and so on, cf. 262, 18; 276, 13.19.26.34; 282, 7; 283, 17; 305, 18.21.25; 326, 60; 331, 5; 333, 22; 339, 4.6; 340, 168; 341, 8. It does not seem to me that the price is being paid only to the seller. All those persons among whom we find mothers (260, 280, 294), children (300: a son, two daughters and a daughter-in-law of another son previously dead), wives (254, 258, 260 cf. infra, 269, 276, where two of five brothers are selling a house and the wives of two of them intervene, 277, 297, 306 where besides the seller’s wife another couple whose relationship to the seller is unknown), express their consent, εδίδοντος to the sale without indicating for which reason they do it. On εδίδοντος see Kunkel, Sinn. Zeitschr. XLVIII 297f., and P. M. Meyer, Jur. Pap. no. 29, 17 who calls those persons “Mitberechtigte” (p. 78, 79) without saying, however, of what kinds their rights are. Apparently rights of inheritance are involved, a problem which is particularly interesting from the juristic viewpoint. Clearer is the situation in 293 where four persons, three brothers and a sister, sell a house through an Egyptian contract and the husband of the woman declares: εδίδοντος για τον προκειμενον ψαλμον. He acts apparently as the kyrios of his wife although he is not mentioned as such. Ιπταλος in the sense of “to agree” is rare, cf. P. Tebt. 201.

An important contribution to the understanding of katagraphe is given by no. 266, a text in excellent condition, where the declarant of the homologia promises to καταγράφων a vineyard through the grapheion of Tebtunis. The editor’s mark “here the katagraphe takes the forms of a ψαλμον” is juristically not beautiful. The document as well as the second hand signature gives occasion to further considerations. The writer of the signature is, as it appears from 350 (cf. p. 164), the father-in-law of the seller. His declaration, ν. 22: παρακαλω την δικαιοσυνη μου λατρειον εξοθισθαι την ψαλμον ὑπο τον επισκόπον καθο δικαιον, does not mean “I agree to render my daughter A. agreeable to the sale whenever it shall be completed” (p. 166). He apparently is the kyrios of his daughter who is interested in the sale achieved by her husband. He declares in her name that she has agreed (not that she will agree) to the sale, this being the meaning qui fundum fruendum locavit, si fundum vendat, curare debet ut apud emptorem quoque eadem pactione colono frui liceat. Without this clause apparently the lessee could be expelled by the purchaser of the land and to avoid this the seller defends the rights of the tenant against the rule that "sale breaks lease" ("Kauf bricht Miete"). For the problem see Frese, Aus gräko-ägyptischem Rechtsleben, 1909, 24; Berger, Ztschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss. XXIX, 1913, 393.

Another feature we met in the Michigan papyri concerning sales is the participation of persons who are next relatives of the seller, but directly have nothing to do either with the object of the sale which expressly is indicated as belonging to the seller, or with the sale itself since the price is being paid only to the seller. All those persons among whom we find mothers (260, 280, 294), children (300: a son, two daughters and a daughter-in-law of another son previously dead), wives (254, 258, 266 cf. infra, 269, 276, where two of five brothers are selling a house and the wives of two of them intervene, 277, 297, 306 where besides the seller's wife another couple whose relationship to the seller is unknown), express their consent, εἴδοκησε to the sale without indicating for which reason they do it. On εἴδοκησε see Kunkel, Sav. Zeitschr. XLVIII 297f. and P. M. Meyer, Jur. Pap. no. 28, 17 who calls those persons "Mitberechtigte" (p. 78, 79) without saying, however, of what kinds their rights are. Apparently rights of inheritance are involved, a problem which is particularly interesting from the juristic viewpoint. Clearer is the situation in 293 where four persons, three brothers and a sister, sell a house through an Egyptian contract and the husband of the woman declares: ἐνθαλείον τῇ πρόκειται πράσει. He acts apparently as the kyrios of his wife although he is not mentioned as such. ἐνθαλείον in the sense of "to agree" is rare, cf. P. Tebt. 201.

An important contribution to the understanding of katagraphe is given by no. 266, a text in excellent condition, where the declarant of the homologia promises to katagraphein a vineyard through the grapheion of Tebtunis. The editor's mark "here the katagraphe takes the forms of a πράσει" is juristically not beautiful. The document as well as the second hand signature gives occasion to further considerations. The writer of the signature is, as it appears from 350 (cf. p. 164), the father-in-law of the seller. His declaration, ν. 22: προέταται τῷ θυγατέρᾳ μου Ἀριανῷ εἰδοκοῦσαν τῇ πράσει ὅπως ὅσαι τελθάν καθὼς πρόκειται, does not mean "I agree to render my daughter A. agreeable to the sale whenever it shall be completed" (p. 166). He apparently is the kyrios of his daughter who is interested in the sale achieved by her husband. He declares in her name that she has agreed (not that she will agree) to the sale, this is the meaning of εὐθοκούσαν. His obligation for the future is to present his daughter when the καταγραφή, the public deed of conveyance, will be made.

A good parallel to 266 is 276, in spite of the different language applied by the parties. The seller assumes the obligation ἀναφίραν τὴν πρᾶσιν διὰ μημονείου ἐξαμαρτήρου. I doubt whether the last expression is to be referred to the well-known syngraphe hexamartyros (thus Dr. Husselman). It is striking that the other three parties to the contract, the co-sellers, bind themselves to the same, but in quite different terms δι' ὅν ἄν διόνυσιν ἐπὶ τῆς μητροπόλεως. The syngraphe hexamartyros was, however, a private document and the sellers of 276 submitted themselves to achieve the transfer through a public deed. It is new that the non-fulfilment of the καταγραφῆς obligation is menaced by the same penalties as the other violations of the contract.

A curious provision is to be found in 305, 14ff., a sale of vacant lots by four brothers. The purchaser’s brother who is the owner of a neighboring ground is bound to open up a gate to provide entrance through his property to be used in common by the owners of the adjacent lots. It is striking that the man does not participate in the agreement and does not sign the document. But even the purchaser himself on whom lies the responsibility for the fulfilment of this obligation by his brother does not sign the document.

The nature of πρόστιμον in 267, 11 and 273, 7—both papyri deal with parachoreis of cataoeic land—is not clear. At any rate it is a public fine, and not a private one, to be paid, maybe, for a delay in paying some taxes or fees. Cf. Berger, Strafklauseln, 10ff. Likewise the nature of pleonasmatos in 260, 17; 262, 23; 267, 10, remains obscure, cf. P. M. Meyer, P.Giss. II p. 24 n. 3. The translation "surtaxes" does not say anything.—The use of anachoreis instead of parachoreis in 259, 31 is new. It is probably a mistake of the writer of the signature, as the editor p. 259 assumes. But the word should be kept in evidence for future publications.—The same characteristic omission occurs in 259, 12.30; 267, 7; 273, 5: after τῶν καθηκονσας the word ὁικονομίας is missing. Ὁικονομίας μεταπυγραφῆς καὶ παραρμήτως are meant, cf. 262, 10.31. The omission for which different writers are responsible is puzzling. Perhaps the writers copied a formulary, used in the office, in which the omission had been made.

Among the sales of slaves (264, 278, 281) particularly interesting is 279 where the seller excludes his responsibility not only for the fugitivity of the slave, which is normal, but also for epilepsy which is against the usual practice, cf. the other two papyri.

Contracts of lease are not so numerous as the sales, but nevertheless not less important because of some interesting details. Thus no. 310, with its new word χερσοκαλαμία (uncultivated land overgrown with reeds), although badly preserved, contains a clause about a cash subvention from the lessor for particular work on the soil. In 311 a farmer of public estates leases a part of them and receives, instead of a rental, a τιμή in advance. No. 312: a lease of a private bath and an adjoining chaff bin is apparently the first example of the kind. The document is a precious contribution to the institution of baths and bath-taxes under the Roman regime. The rental in wheat is to be paid in monthly instalments, the lessor having moreover the right to select ten men who may make use of the bath free from the admission fee. Introduction and commentary by Boak are remarkable. In this connection no. 234, a receipt for a bath-tax, may be mentioned.

Of particular juristic interest is a group of documents, 317-327, concerning divisions of property, diaireseis. Especially nos. 321 and 322a are perfect examples of a divisio parentis inter liberos (cf. Taubenschlag, Law cit. 155f., whose presentations could be now richly completed) with a lot of new details which require a monographic treatment. The first document contains the clause μετὰ τὴν ἀδίνη, i.e. that the division had to be effectuated after his death. But seemingly it was made during the father's life since the eldest son to whom the largest share was assigned has to provide the father with food, clothes, etc. during his lifetime. An unknown charge is mentioned in 321, 21 αυλητικής καὶ προς μονσικάν (l. — ἠ). The editor explains it as the tax paid by a flute player. Between the two documents is a great difference. No. 321 should not be qualified as "a will in the form of a contract for the division of property," as Dr. Husselman, p. 259, did, since there is no contract at all. There are no signatures of the persons involved, except that of the father making the will. On the contrary in no. 322 all children, two sons, two daughters, and a grandson, son of a third son who had died before, undertake precise bindings in this division of property by their father Psuphis, and declare their consent (v. 35 ειδικοίαν). Furthermore the division enters immediately into existence since the father effectuated the division on the spot (vv. 2, 17, 28, 38: ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν) and just for this reason the usual clause μετὰ τὴν τελευτήν is missing. In the same document a similar division is made by Psuphis' wife, the mother of the same children, and also ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν. The document is therefore a common division of both parents (divisio parentum inter liberos). But the property belonging to each of the parents is separately disposed of. The wife gives even a part of her property to another grandson, the son of a still living son. Therefore it cannot be said that "322a is a contract of the same type as 321, but the words μετὰ τὴν τελευτήν have been omitted" (p. 26), although some provisions are similar and some clauses allude to the future death of the parents, vv. 20, 33.
No. 326 is also a diairesis, perfectly preserved without any lacuna. It concerns a division of a property inherited from their parents by five brothers and a sister (land, vineyard, slaves). Together with the foregoing texts this document is instructive from different viewpoints. To a division of slaves refers also 323: four slaves are divided among three brothers. The youngest receives two slaves, but one of them is lame, and the other remains in service with the mother of the brothers.

Nos. 328–336 are loans, some of them of the well-known type on security (ὡν ἐν πίστει, cf. Taubenschlag, Law cit. p. 206).—No. 327 is a receipt for wages. The editor’s remark “the contract lacks subscription” is not correct. An acknowledgment of the receipt of money is not a contract, a subscription of the paying person is not required.—In 338 the receipt of a deed, ἡμολογία ἐκκάθωσι is being acknowledged. The document is addressed to the nomographos Kronion in whose office the respective transaction has been concluded. Two other documents are in direct relation with the activity of the director of the record office. No. 353 is a guarantee of indemnification given to the same Kronion for having issued to the declarant a contract of cession (parachoresis), prepared for his father, without the proper warrant, επισταλμα (cf. Taubenschlag, Law cit. 170). Both this document and the following no. 354, the whereabouts of which are rather complicated, throw a light on the responsibility of the official in charge of the grapheion. Both documents guarantee indemnification to him from any risk he might have in consequence of his carelessness. The term for the guarantee is ἀπιριστάσιον, παρίχθαι, hence the name of such declarations ἀπιριστάσιον (cf. supra). The term occurs in 353, 4 and 354, 19 and is translated by the editor “free from danger of arrest” and “free from constraint” respectively. It is doubtful, however, whether the director of the grapheion could be arrested for inaccuracy or lack of caution in his functioning. It is more likely that his responsibility was merely a financial one and to it referred the guarantee in question.

A group of documents deals with matrimonial relations. No. 339 is an evidence for an additional dowry constituted durante matrimonio, ἐν προσφορά. In the grapheion register 240, 26 the agreement is called prosphora, which is a new meaning of the term. Both terms appear in 340 where “a settlement of property made by the parent or parents of a wife to the husband or to herself in addition to the customary dowry (φιρνή) and the bride’s personal belongings. It may be defined as ‘a donatio propter nuptias’” (Boak, p. 318). The qualification is not appropriate since d.p.n. was a creation by Justinian. The same kind of gift is called in 339 φιρνή, and in our document, v. 10: ἐν προσφορά φιρνή. The document is, although apparently a draft with many corrections, of great importance because of the mention of two marriage-contracts, an Egyptian and a Greek one, cf.
vv. 26ff. (the same in 431, 4), the provisions for the different forms of separation, vv. 40ff., 53ff., the πράξεις ὧς καὶ Πέρονος τῆς ἐντονής etc.

In this connection three contracts should be mentioned by which the declarant parties (all of them women) resign their claims to the property of their parents (or sister) for ever, nos. 350-352. This kind of declarations is called by the technical term ekstasis. The declarations of 350 and 352 are connected with the dowry which the renouncing parties had received when they married. In 350, 11 the declarant makes a reservation as to the women's utensils and clothing belonging to her mother. These objects do not enter into the resignation. In 351, however, the cause of the ekstasis is not given. We wish to add that several other documents not mentioned here individually, and a few demotic papyri (cf. infra) may be profitably exploited when dealing with the law of marriage in Egypt at the beginning of the Roman period (as, for instance, mentions of ἐγγράφως or ἀγράφως ςυνείναι, once in 254, 7 we read: ἤ συνοδοὶ μας κατὰ νόμον γαλήν). and with the law of guardianship as well.

To another field belong the last Greek papyri of the volume. No. 346 is a contract for apprenticeship of a slave-girl. The teacher, a weaver, undertakes to teach her the art of weaving "as he himself knows it." A clause, so far unknown, is added: "if I shall not teach her, he declares,—or she shall be considered not to know what she has been taught, you will perforce have her taught at my own expense." When we take into consideration, that the weaver does not receive any gratification, the clause seems simply incredible. On the other hand some usual clauses are wanting. There is no provision about the slave girl's staying in the weaver's house (which is however likely since her owner uses in his subscription the term ἐκδεδωμα), no penalty clause is settled. The provision about her feeding and clothing is not quite clear: it is not said who is obliged to do it, either the teacher or the owner. The editor (Dr. Husselman) explains the text in the sense of the first alternative. But why does the weaver oblige himself to give the slave a tunic of a considerable value? If he had to clothe her he would not have stipulated to supply her a tunic separately. And furthermore: the owner of the girl signs the contract too, "under the foregoing conditions." If he had not undertaken any obligation at all, his signature would have been superfluous.

No. 348 is a contract of partnership which are not very frequent. Cf. Taubenschlag, Law cit. 294. Three lessees accept a fourth partner in a four year lease of a catocic allotment.—No. 355: contract for service to a weaver concluded with the worker himself. Some noteworthy points: the weaver has to pay quite a series of taxes and fees for the worker in an extension as not met so far, beginning with the poll-tax and the γερμάκαν τέλεσιμα. The salary amounts to one artab of wheat monthly and a sum of money annually on account of clothing and oil. The worker is obliged to do work according to the orders of his master and not to absent himself from the work under the fine of two drachmas for every day of absence. He has furthermore to accompany the master everywhere he goes according to the law. What law is meant is not known. The obligation to stay with the master is referred only to day-time (v. 10: ἀφήμιρο, cf. v. 12) without any mentioning of the night, as so often in similar agreements (ἄιτόκοιτοι), cf. 241, 34 and Berger, Strafklauseln, 1911, 167. W. L. Westermann, Class. Philol. IX, 1914, 310. A. Zambon, Aegyptus XV, 1935, 53f.

P. Mich. V contains also six Demotic texts. For their edition William F. Edgerton is responsible. Four of them concern sales and, with one exception (342), all of them are provided with Greek subscriptions by the parties involved. The subscriptions generally confirm the contents of the Αἰγύπτιοι συγγραφή referred to, sometimes not without some new details corresponding more to the Greek formularies, cf. for instance 249, 2; 250, 4; 253, 19; in the last sale contract the seller, a woman, appears with her son as a guardian, cf. Taubenschlag, Law cit. 128. In 347, a syngraphe trophitis, the Greek subscription unfortunately is very badly preserved. There appears twice the term proprasis which has been known from P. Mich. II 121 R (cf. p. 348 n. to vv. 1-2, where “and 6” is to be cancelled). The demotic text does not contribute to the elucidation of the term which seems to be obscure in spite of the explanation given by Arangio-Ruiz, Persone e famiglia, 1930, 51 and others.

The edition is technically perfect. Among papyrological publications P. Mich. V will rank with the most remarkable ones, not only because of its rich contents of which only a few samples have been rendered conspicuous above, but also because of the excellent conditions in which most of the papyri published are preserved, the successful decipherment and proper adaptation of all documents by the editors. It is self-understood that exact indices following the best models of the kind are added. They occupy not less than 74 pages. Six plates with the reproduction of one Demotic and five Greek papyri conclude the volume.

Adolf Berger.

"The essay aims"—as the author p. 1 points out,—"to state some basic points on the nature of real property in antiquity." The chief result of his research "lies in having made clear the political character of the right of property in the ancient classical world"; to attain this result the author "was compelled to enter an exhaustive inquiry on the transfer of real