The independence of economic activities prevailing among craftsmen did not exclude production relations between the craftsmen members of the same guild. The economic interdependence appeared especially vividly when the guild performed the work in common, but we have no evidence that the guilds used common stocks of raw materials, as is asserted by some scholars basing their argument on the text of P. Oxy. I, 85 (338 A.D.). The membership of the guild undoubtedly contributed to the development of the consciousness of solidarity, and united and consolidated the craftsmen in the struggle for their interests, perhaps as well as in the struggle for the increase of salaries and the
