This work is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the publication of the Roman sources of the law, the XII Tables and other leges, the plebiscita, public treaties, edicts and senatusconsulta. The author's thesis is that the publication of the law presupposed its validity and this idea was adopted by the Romans for the above mentioned sources of the law. In the second part the author discusses the publication of the Roman law in the provinces, particularly in Egypt. Here the author discusses the way in which the edict had to pass from the governor to the place of its placard, the placard itself, the officials charged with the latter, the place of its hanging out, the manner in which the hanging out took place, the material and the language of the placard, the duration of the placard, as well as the constitutive efficacy of the publication. An appendix treats of the same problems in the Ptolemaic law and its relation to the Roman law. The third part is devoted to the imperial constitutions. In this part, the author points out that the Codex Theodosianus adopted for the imperial constitutions the Greek idea on the constitutive efficacy of the publication.

The Egyptian papyri of the Roman period show that there was no legislative unity in the Roman provinces before Theodosius and Justinian in the field of private law. Thus, for instance, the imperial legislation (Gnom. § 4.38.107) introduced provisions for exposed children in Egypt, quite different from those in Italy. Consequently, if we find in a constitution issued before Theodosius, provisions different from those enforced in that time in Italy, we can assert that this constitution was applied only in a particular Roman province such as Egypt, Syria and so on.
